Thanh Ha is a small pottery village on the bank of the Thu Bon River, about three kilometres from Hoi An. For hundreds of years, the villagers have made bricks, tiles and pots by hand. However, some years ago, many young people left the village to find jobs in big cities because making pottery did not bring them enough money.

Things began to change when rural tourism arrived. Today, visitors can join hands-on workshops where they shape clay on a spinning wheel and bake their own small products. Some families have turned their old houses into homestays, so tourists can experience the daily life of the villagers, cook local dishes and cycle along the river. Thanks to the money from tourism, the traditional craft has been kept alive, and many young people have returned home to work.

However, tourism also brings problems. On busy days, the narrow streets become crowded and noisy, and there is more plastic waste. Local leaders now encourage eco-friendly tourism: visitors are asked to use refillable water bottles and to travel by bicycle instead of motorbike. They believe that tourism should help the village develop without destroying its peaceful atmosphere.
